National and international public health experts continue to warn that the public should be prepared for another round of COVID-19 this fall, based on patterns of other seasonal coronaviruses and influenza viruses. Mike Ryan, Executive Director of the World Health Organization's Health Emergencies Program, states that countries should "continue to put in place the public-health and social measures, the surveillance measures, the testing measures and a comprehensive strategy to ensure that we continue on a downwards trajectory, and we don't have an immediate second peak."
